PHILADELPHIA, June 30. The following is from the Washington papers: The attendant upon Mr. Clay yesterdsy (the 28th) saw that a change had taken place, indi cating a breaking up of his aystem. At night he was calm, but his mind wandered. In a low necessary. At the last interview with Dr. Butler the dying man expressed entire patience, resignation, and confidence in his Redeemer. This morning, the 29th, he continued per fectly tranquil though exceedingly feeble, and o'clock he asked for some cool water which he was in the habit of taking through a silver tabe: upon removing the tube from his mouth he appeared to have more difficulty in awallowing than previously. He turned to his son and said "don't lesve me." Soon sfter, he motioned to have his shirt collar opened, and then added, "I as to be acarcely able to converse with his son or Dr. Butler.

No one was present at his death, except his son, Thomss Hart Clay, and Gov. Jones, of Tennessee. His last moments were calm and quiet, and he seemed in full possession of all his faculties, and apparently suffering but little. His countenance to the last indicated a full knowledge of his condition.

He had long since made every preparation for his death, giving his aon full instructions as to the disposition of his body and the settlement of his wordly affairs.
